Chapter 1: The Girl Who Hated Mornings

Luna hated mornings.

Not because she was lazy.

Not because she loved sleep.

But because waking up meant facing a world she no longer liked.

Her room was always quiet. Too quiet.

The kind of silence that made your thoughts louder than they should be.

“Luna, breakfast is ready!” her mother called from downstairs.

“I’m not hungry!” she replied, her voice flat, practiced.

She stared at the ceiling.

Every day felt the same.

Same walls.

Same people.

Same emptiness.

Her phone buzzed.

Riya: Are you coming to college today?

Luna typed... deleted... typed again.

Luna: No. Not feeling well.

That was her favorite excuse.

Not feeling well.

Because how do you explain something you don't understand yourself?

Later that evening, she stepped out of the house.

Not because she wanted to.

But because staying inside felt suffocating.

The streets were noisy. People laughing. Talking. Living.

She felt... disconnected.

That's when she saw it.

A huge movie banner across the road.

A famous actor.

Sharp eyes. Soft smile.

He looked... warm.

Alive.

Happy.

Everything she wasn't.

She stopped walking.

For the first time in days... her thoughts paused.

Her lips almost curved into a smile.

"Why do you look so... perfect?" she whispered.

A car honked behind her, breaking the moment.

She looked away quickly and walked home.

But that face stayed in her mind.

That night... she couldn't stop thinking about him.

The way he smiled.

The way his eyes felt like they understood something.

“Stupid...” she muttered, closing her eyes.

But her heart felt... lighter.

For the first time in a long time.
